ARBOR DAY.—Finer weather for Arbor Day than that of yesterday could not be imagined, and the custom of tree-planting by school children was inaugurated in this State under most encouraging circumstances. The day was very generally observed. In many places the planting was accompanied by appropriate literary exercises, the recitation of verses, speeches and the like. It is not difficult to demonstrate the advantage the community must derive from the multiplication of trees in suitable places, and as the good effects of what was done yesterday become manifest from year to year the celebration of Arbor Day will be well established in Maryland. States in which for some years past a day has been given yearly to the planting of useful trees are already enjoying to a large extent the benefits resulting from a wider interest in arboriculture.—*Balt.
